HOUSE BILL NO. 34

EXPLANATORY NOTE

This bill seeks to improve access to communications, including internet service, for Filipino students by reducing the cost of such services.

Internet access has become an essential tool for learning in the country, especially with the changes brought about by the COVID-19 pandemic. In addition to e-learning, research and collaboration among students are facilitated by access to the internet. Digital skills are not just marketable but have also become essential as companies seek to compete in the new marketplace.

However, internet penetration remains low, and service prices remain high. In a World Bank policy note, the Philippines is estimated to have half of the ASEAN population unconnected to mobile broadband. Currently, the websites of major telecom operators show that a month of call, text, and internet access can cost as low as ₱399 to ₱596 for mobile prepaid promotions and from ₱388 to ₱599 for basic SIM-only postpaid plans. These costs reflect a day or two of the prevailing minimum wage throughout the country. Without direct assistance from the government, Filipinos will lose their competitive edge in the marketplace. The inability of Filipinos to compete will throttle the growth of the economy, sparking a vicious cycle.

This bill seeks to solve one aspect of the problem – the cost of access to telecommunication services to learners. With this first step, it is hoped that the competitive edge of Filipino students will be retained and even enhanced.

In view of the foregoing, the immediate passage of this bill is earnestly sought.
